Brand concept and copy

Barni Pickles

The brand	Homemade pickles from four kitchens across India. Each one is made in small batches by a home cook, and every jar carries her name.
The launch range	Avakaya from Guntur, Andhra Pradesh. Chhundo from Rajkot, Gujarat. Mixed achaar from Amritsar, Punjab. Naranga achaar from Kottayam, Kerala.
Who it's for	People between 22 and 35 who have moved to a new city for work or college, and who miss food from home more than they say out loud.
The ask	A launch idea, a 60 second film, print ads, outdoor, the jar label and social posts for launch week.
Tone	Warm and full of feeling, with a small smile here and there.

The insight

In almost every Indian home, when a child leaves for a new city, a jar of pickle goes into the bag. Wrapped in two plastic covers, tied with a rubber band, squeezed between the clothes. Nobody asks for it. It just goes. And months later, that jar is often the last bit of home still left in the room.

The campaign line

Home fits in a jar.

Used as the sign off on every piece. Anyone who has lived away from home knows how true it is.

Launch film (60 seconds, for YouTube and Instagram)

TIME	WHAT WE SEE	WHAT WE HEAR
0 to 8s	A small PG room, first night in a new city. Arjun, 23, unzips his bag. Between his shirts is a steel jar wrapped in plastic and tied with a rubber band.	His mother on the phone: "Achaar rakha hai bag mein. Khana time pe khana."
8 to 18s	Weeks pass in quick cuts. Late nights, office lunches, canteen dal. Each time, a spoon of pickle from the jar. The jar slowly gets lighter.	Only the sounds of the city. A spoon tapping against steel.
18 to 28s	Other people, other cities. A nurse on a night shift in Delhi. A student in Bengaluru. A young couple in Mumbai sharing the last bit of chhundo with one roti.	Voice over: "In every new city, there's one jar that always runs out first."
28 to 42s	A doorbell. A Barni parcel. Arjun opens the jar, and before tasting it, he smells it. His eyes close for a second. On the label: Made by Lakshmi garu, Guntur.	Voice over: "Barni pickles are made by home cooks across India. In small batches. The way they make it for their own families."
42 to 54s	Arjun on a video call with his mother, holding up the jar.	Arjun: "Maa, bilkul aapke jaisa hai. Almost." Mother, pretending to be offended: "Almost?" They both laugh.
54 to 60s	End card. The four jars in a row.	Voice over: "Barni. Home fits in a jar."

Print ad 1 (full page, the main story)

Nobody in India leaves home without a jar of pickle.

She packs it between your clothes. She wraps it in two plastic covers and still tells you to be careful with it. It's supposed to last three months. It usually lasts three weeks.

Barni pickles are made in small batches by home cooks from four corners of the country, the same way they make it for their own families. Every jar carries the name of the woman who made it.

Because some things should never come from a factory.

Barni. Home fits in a jar.

Print ad 2 (half page, introducing a maker)

Made by Lakshmi garu in Guntur. Packed for you in Gurugram.

Lakshmi garu has made avakaya every summer for forty years. Raw mangoes cut the same morning. Mustard ground by hand. Oil heated until it smells just right.

She doesn't measure anything. She just knows. And now her jar can find you, wherever work has taken you.

Barni. Home fits in a jar.

Print ad 3 (half page, the range)

Four kitchens. Four states. One feeling.

Avakaya, Andhra Pradesh. Hot enough to make you reach for water. Good enough to make you reach for more.

Chhundo, Gujarat. Sweet, sticky, and gone before the thepla gets cold.

Mixed achaar, Punjab. Carrot, lime and green chilli, with the smell of a winter afternoon on the terrace.

Naranga achaar, Kerala. Tangy lime that tastes like Onam lunch on a banana leaf.

Barni. Home fits in a jar.

Outdoor (short enough to read from a moving auto)

Missing home? There's a jar for that.	Near PGs and hostels in Bengaluru, Pune and Hyderabad.
Canteen dal needs a friend.	Office areas in Gurugram, Noida and Whitefield, close to lunch spots.
Every train back from home carries a jar of pickle.	Railway stations on Sunday evenings, when people are travelling back to work after a visit home.

Jar label (back of the avakaya jar)

THIS JAR WAS MADE BY

Lakshmi garu, Guntur

She has been making avakaya every summer since she got married. She cuts the mangoes the same morning, grinds the mustard herself and never lets anyone else touch the oil.

Keep it in a cool, dry place. Always use a dry spoon. Try not to let anyone else finish it.

If this jar reminds you of someone, write to her at hello@barni.in. We'll make sure your note reaches her kitchen.

Social, launch week

POST 1 : TWO DAYS BEFORE LAUNCH

What was in the jar your mother packed when you left home?
Tell us in the comments. We're reading every single one.

POST 2 : LAUNCH DAY

Barni is here.
Four pickles, from four kitchens, made by four women who have been doing this longer than most of us have been alive. Every jar has her name on it.
Order yours today. Link in bio.

POST 3 : MAKER REEL

Meet Mary chechi from Kottayam. She has made naranga achaar for every family wedding since 1987.
We asked for her secret. She said, "Patience. And good limes."

Lines that didn't make it

- "The authentic taste of India." Every pickle brand says this. Nobody remembers it.
- "Achaar made with love." Sweet, but it could go on any jar in the market.
- "Grandma's recipe." Most of our makers are mothers, not grandmothers. They deserve to be named properly.

Why I wrote it this way. In India, pickle is never just food. It's the parcel of home that travels with you. So instead of talking about spice or taste, the whole campaign talks about that jar in the bag, a moment almost everyone has lived. The makers are always named, because a real name and a real town make people trust a jar more than any claim on the label ever could. And the "Almost?" moment in the film keeps it from getting too heavy. It lets people smile right after they feel something.
